Vegetable oils, such as soybean oil, corn oil, rape seed oil, olive oil, safflower oil, peanut oil, cottonseed oil, palm oil, and palm kernel oil, are major sources for edible oil. These oils are generally rich in unsaturated fatty acids, and have thus been used as edible fats or high-temperature oils. However, they also have the following drawbacks, which limit their general use as a food: (1) they have poor shelf life, (2) they are expensive, and (3) they are very susceptible to oxidation. These drawbacks are partly due to the fact that the unsaturated fatty acids in the oil are easily oxidized at high temperatures. Some vegetable oils, such as soybean oil and rapeseed oil, are rich in the methyl ester of polyunsaturated fatty acids (PUFAs), such as linoleic acid (C18:2) and linolenic acid (C18:3). These oils are used as food additives and/or as substitutes for partially hydrogenated vegetable oils 3e33713323
