Now that I have a good understanding of the Flying Dutchie, it is time to bring you an in depth review on the FSX version of the plane! The flight experience itself is much different than the real deal. I spent the whole flight trying to keep the plane stable at the altitude I was at, I need to fly a lot more before I can make any statements on how it is compared to the real thing. One of my first flights with the plane was with the Flight Replicas Cub Pack that is available through Flight Sim World. It comes with an amazing amount of content. It includes the tutorial, the plane, sounds, and parts/decals. The parts are the best I have seen for this plane to date, I would say they are on par with the real thing. When I finally got the chance to fly the plane by itself, I was surprised. The shakedown flight is very smooth and stable. It is also a great plane to fly in the air as it has a very good airspeed. The plane tends to get a little tail happy when taxiing, but other than that it flies really well. The specs are good, it has access to the GLD and is good for about 25-35 min per flight. The sound is absolutely amazing. It sounds almost as good as a real plane. Now for the bad side of things, the plane has its own quirks. When you first start the plane, it will start with a default state with the flaps set to about 20. When you want to fly with the flaps set to 0, the plane will automatically turn on the engine, which makes it very difficult to fly with the flaps set to 0. The cockpit design is a little weird. The instruments are nicely designed and look like they are part of the plane. The pilot and co-pilot are sitting on a panoramic view. The co-pilot can be dragged around to look at the ground and help you pick your landing spot. The cockpit is very responsive and easy to handle. This plane is a great plane to fly and a great buy for those looking for a real feel plane. OS and FSAA Configuration: OS: Windows 7 Pro 64 bit SP1 Clock/Time: GMT Memory: 1 GB RAM Flight Control: FSAA enabled System Requirements: Befitting for workstation use, Flying Dutchie will run smoothly on
