Ratings Amazon Customer Reviews: The New York Times published a story today that is among the most concise, predictive, and chilling profiles yet of the new breed of far-right militants who have been flocking to far-right social media and now are readying to act on their daily nightmares. Videos of these new “alt-right” activists frequently feature YouTube-like qualities, such as fast-cutting, intentionally staged chaos, and a surreal, cartoon-style aesthetic. Their rhetoric, when it comes out at all, is often dense with poorly translated Russian memes and appropriated language; even more disturbing is the positioning of this unbridled online army as poised to form a cyber-brigade to revolt against the authorities. The Times article, by David Masciotra, Nick Bilton, and Steven Russolillo, paints an oft-times chilling picture of the movement, its online ecosystem, and the long-term goals of the young men and women fueling it. The outbreak of online political violence appears to be driven by a blend of racially fueled grievance, a romantic longing for the counter-culture of the 1960s, and a desire to resist de-platforming by social media platforms that appear to be attempting to clean up the web by punishing mainstream conservatives and the far right. In August, a masked gunman who identified himself as a sovereign citizen opened fire on a group of counterprotesters at a white nationalist rally in Charlottesville, Va. The event was loosely organized by groups such as Identity Evropa, which openly proclaims its ideology as white nationalism. The gunman, James A. Fields Jr., was charged with second-degree murder and other counts; he has pleaded not guilty. This violent scenario represented the mainstream right’s first real foray into online political violence in decades. The next day, however, Twitter deleted a group of trolls that had been attacking users who opposed Mr. Trump and his supporters, saying it had violated its own policies. The article describes how the “alt-right” approached social media in a freewheeling online marketplace. A new generation of trolls, political propagandists and online provocateurs began taking advantage of the platform’s affordances, such as mixing spam links and “likes” with vitriolic images and reposting videos. They exploited memes and ironically took their own anti-Semitic imagery that played 82138339de
