Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to a method for fabricating a semiconductor device and, more particularly, to a method for fabricating a semiconductor device having a dielectric layer formed by using liquid phase oxidation. 2. Description of the Related Art In general, most semiconductor devices have a dielectric layer formed on a silicon substrate. In particular, a gate dielectric layer is usually formed of a thermal oxide layer formed at a temperature of 1,100.degree. C. or more and a high-k dielectric layer is usually formed of a non-thermal oxide layer formed at a temperature of 750.degree. C. or less. However, since the high-k dielectric layer usually has a low dielectric constant, a leakage current generated between the gate dielectric layer and the high-k dielectric layer is increased. In order to solve this problem, a dielectric layer formed by using liquid phase oxidation has been proposed in the art. In detail, a porous layer is formed by performing a high temperature annealing process, then an oxide layer is deposited by using a chemical vapor deposition method, and finally the deposited oxide layer is liquid-phase oxidized to form a dielectric layer having an increased dielectric constant. A low-temperature annealing process is required in this fabrication process because a high-k dielectric layer is formed at a low temperature. However, when the temperature of the silicon substrate is decreased to about 400.degree. C. in a high-temperature process, the quality of the resulting gate dielectric layer is not improved. to their reaction at, say, 15 minutes. I just say that we don't know how stable it is, and, in a sense, the more we learn about it, the less stable it appears." Climate scientists often use this "15 minutes" of warming

The GodFather is a standalone application that provides a powerful yet user-friendly audio Editing tags, finding duplicates, and instantly converting audio files Organize your music collection with the free music organizer Google Music Getting rid of duplicate songs in your music library may seem like a trivial task, but you'll be surprised how many files there are that are duplicates of each other. So, before you waste time figuring out which one is better, your best bet is to tag and organize all of them. A good music organizer with detailed reports will help you out here, but if you're looking for a simple solution, you can take a look at the program Google Music, an online music organizer for managing your music collection. The Google Music website is divided into two sections: Home, where you will find a small selection of music you've uploaded to the system, sorted by album, artists, genres, and keywords. Google Play, the actual music organizer, which, as the name implies, is a marketplace you can use to get hold of music from third-party providers. Once you've logged in to Google Music, you're presented with a navigation window with four tabs: Playlists, Albums, Artists, and Genres. These tabs are automatically sorted based on the type of music in your collection, and you can change their order by clicking and dragging the tab. Clicking on an album, artist, or genre will take you to the respective sub-sections. To be honest, the homepage is pretty sparse, but you'll soon learn how to navigate around the website. The section called Playlists holds your music files, which are grouped based on the tags you've added to them. There are both free and paid playlists, and you can create your own as well. Albums are organized by albums, which allows you to find all your songs related to a given album. If you're looking for an artist, the section Artists is your best bet. There you'll find your favorite musicians sorted by albums, songs, genres, or keywords. Google Music is great for finding artists and songs, but the Genres section is an excellent resource for organizing your music based on their genres. If you're looking for a band that specializes in metal, for example, you can simply search for their name and all your songs from all the years will be listed

More particularly, the present disclosure relates to surgical instruments and methods of using the surgical instruments for performing endoscopic or laparoscopic surgical procedures. Endoscopic and laparoscopic procedures are minimally invasive surgical procedures in which instruments are introduced into the patient through natural orifices, including the patient's skin. In a majority of the procedures, trocars are utilized. The trocars provide working channels into the body cavity, through which a variety of surgical instruments may be introduced. The trocars have a very small inner diameter to facilitate movement of the surgical instruments within the body cavity. The inner diameter of the trocar may be about 4 mm, for example, and the trocar and the surgical instrument have an outer diameter of about 12 mm, for example. The trocar is inserted through the natural orifice to allow access to the body cavity. The trocar provides a conduit for instruments and other devices to be inserted into and removed from the body cavity. In some procedures, a trocar and the instrumentation inserted through the trocar are
